

03/17/26

Jayden Rice Writing

I have a question about whether W. E. B. DuBois was disagreeing with Karl Marx, or adding to his ideas. The concept of double consciousness implies that societies don't change purely from economic and class factors, but also from race. So is DuBois implying that Karl's ideas are wrong or just incomplete.

I have a personal ethos that different societies have different needs depending on its demographics; would you agree? yes.

or from how they decide to construct the concept of race

are just incomplete

But there is also a very Marxian way of seeing this too. The "relations of production" of slavery structure how the slave (at the free point) experience life. If you are a slave, what relationship do you have to your work life? How would you see labor? If you are suddenly set free, how (or in most cases - once you have freed yourself) how much psychological change do you have to go through to turn yourself into the type of worker that were going to talk about with Marx later next time?