Jayden Rice (Great Work)

While reading this work I found Karl's prediction of the people of capitalist systems will revolt due to their increasing impoverishment. This idea of a great revolution to the current to western, and especially American administrations, has been flung around more in recent times. Whether that be from decreased trust in government systems, falling wages and buying power, or an increasing disdain for the "elite", Karl Marx's prediction seems to be probable. I don't think this is a fault of capitalist systems though, but a degradation of certain sets of values (mainly western ones). Why do you think there hasn't been a revolution yet? - There's an enormous literature out there about this.

Obviously, it's complicated. One reason that the U.S. has been less revolutionary in class terms has to do with race. Another has to do with an expanding frontier until the end of the 1800s. There are other factors too.
